For example, metal cutting machines, such as shear machines, banding machines, or edge-trimming machines, may be used to shape metal into a desired shape. Further, some metal cutting machines may be configured to form and/or shape the metal while it is in a substantially continuous length. For example, such a machine may include a one or more rotating cutting blades, which may be configured to cut the metal as the metal is passed beneath the rotating cutting blades. The cutting blades of such metal cutting machines may be separated by a bed of cut-producing material or elements, such as teeth, plates, or other elements. The bed of cut-producing material may be formed of an appropriate material to prevent and/or reduce build up of metal chips on the bed of cut-producing material and/or may provide a surface suitable for carrying chips away from the cutting blades. Machines configured to cut and/or shape a continuous length of metal may generally be referred to as a continuous-length cutting machine. However, some continuous-length cutting machines may be configured to cut or shape a short segment of metal, as well. Such a machine may include a relatively short bed of cut-producing material and
